

"Dedicated to St. Angela. The Foundress of Ursulines"

"Love all your students equally and do not show preferences for one more than another, because they are all God's children and you have no idea of what He wishes to make of them. How can you know that those, who to you seem worthless and unattractive, will not be the very ones to show greatest generosity and be the most pleasing to His Divine Majesty? Who can be judge of another being's heart and in most thoughts? Welcome them and bear with all of them impartially, for it is not for you to judge God's servants. He knows exactly what He intends to do with them, for He can raise up children for eternity from the very stones. You do your duty, correcting them with love and charity, when you notice them, falling into some fault through human frailty, and never cease to cultivate this vine that has been entrusted to you. After that, leave the rest to God, to work His wonders at the time while He finds best."
